Personal Space & Invasion of Privacy

It is commonly argued that our personal spaces are inevitably penetrated in modern and postmodern times with exponentially accelerating connection among the personal and public spaces. Have we indeed voluntarily or involuntarily lost our privacy, or have we created a new meaning for private space by including new manners in it? How did this change take place? What is the state's role in this change as an object and a subject? How are the interpersonal relationships affected by this change?

In this week's Today Talks session, we invite you to a discussion on how our personal spaces are affected by the interference of technological devices, communication technologies, formation of the modern state and the increasing of the urban population.
