Communication technologies, inventions and technical development has enabled communities to spread their knowledge, information as well as their opinions to far reaching corners of the world. Printing press, telegram, radio, television have all come into use and been followed by wide-spread warfare. In the age of internet and supranational states, how would new forms of communication among peoples impact states’ and nations’ relations with each other.

In this session of today talks we will be focusing of mobilization of masses, communication technologies and supranational & transborder nationalisms.
